When we sat down to plan for all the various Google projects and launches, but if I had to pinpoint one area that would stand out it would be security. We have a few new initiatives and products that were launched last year that focused on the security end of things. My personal favorite was the introduction of the Google Fixit Android app which has continued to receive stellar feedback and seems to make regular appearances in top app lists for a number of reasons. The other big area of focus over the past year was the release of new tools and strategies to help us defend our users from cyber threats. We created Cloud Security Appliance Google Cloud G Suite, which went live in December and dramatically improved G Suite security for our business users. But we didn't stop there. We also introduced the new security center. It is an intuitive and easy way to manage all of your security settings. The security center gives you a quick view of all your data protection and security options and the settings in the new actionable security dashboard. It is the starting point for the new threat defense feature that starts rolling out to users this year. Today, we are introducing the new threat defense feature. I want to remind you that it is still in beta and, while it is available for all G Suite business users, we'd love feedback and input on how it is working for you. In fact, we'd love to hear about how you are being affected by the new threat defense feature, so we can make sure it's helping you. In the coming weeks we will be rolling it out to users across the globe, with the goal of making it more widely available over the coming months. It will be in the G Suite security dashboard, so you should find a little icon there that you can click to launch the new threat defense settings page. We would love to hear your thoughts and ideas, as well as any feedback you have on how you think it's working for you.#!/bin/bash # description: event trigger - test inter-event histogram trigger with wrong loglevel # requires: cron_macros
