With nine races to go and nowhere left to go, a win can be the difference between World Superbike supremacy and All-Japan Superbike chaos. Newcomers Maxime Berger (Tech3) and Davide Giugliano (Kawasaki) gave the title favourites a late scare to snatch the win on Saturday at the Sachsenring. While the German and Italian showed fantastic pace, Zakysia Matuz-Lukacz (Honda), Noriyuki Haga (Kawasaki) and Christophe Laghi (Honda) all collided, allowing the battle between the leaders to go right down to the wire. Berger had led from start to finish, and when Lukacz ran off track, Berger made sure to take advantage. He forged ahead, then hit the back of his rival's bike at hairpin 13, sliding the Kawasaki into the gravel and then regaining the line. This time he held on to win by 0.8s. "I'm glad I won. I knew he would come back at me, so I waited for him at the first corner. And when he went off track, I just went to the end and took the position. At that moment I felt good, I felt good on the bike. But for the finish I lost the front and I crashed a little bit on the turn eight. But I'm glad I could bring it home! It's super fast, and it's a pleasure to ride here. I'm really happy. I'm super happy", said Berger. Giugliano, on the other hand, was even happier after he had finished second, albeit just half a second behind his team-mate. He had shown first-hand the advantage of being up the front, and used it to good effect when the pack started to work in packs. He had to be patient for his chance, but then came on to take advantage of the chaos. "It's really good to be second. We can do something, it's a good result. I had been out front, I knew that I was gaining speed. Then I came with the two Kawasaki riders. They said and infant formula on the expression of the T lymphocyte activation-associated surface antigen CD25 and receptor CD69 in breast-fed infants. Mothers of healthy full term newborns were randomized to receive either casein, infant formula, or human milk for up to 10 months. Peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMC) were isolated and RNA extracted. Mean levels of CD25, CD69, and the two receptors CD4,
